Customer Reviews

Erica Strauss has the goal of helping men and women everywhere turn their homes into centers of production instead of places of consumption. That's a big challenge to wrestle with, but her new book The Hands-On Home: A Seasonal Guide to Cooking, Preserving & Natural Homekeeping shows you how. Instead of dousing our bathrooms in chemicals, Erica gives step-by-step instructions for making a potty powder and an acidic bathroom cleaner. Instead of buying sugary jam from the grocery store, she teaches readers to can their own preserves without using pectin. Well, Erica would have to pry the pectin box away from my cold, dead hands, but I'm willing to give her other ideas a try. So are her legions of fans who adore her well-known site: Northwest Edible Life. Sasquatch Books in Seattle sent me a free, advanced copy of The Hands-On Home this summer in exchange for my honest opinions and review. For me as a homemaker, it was love at first sight. The construction of the book is everything I expect from Sasquatch: fine quality pages, beautiful illustrations, and a style that walks the fine line between folksy and hip. The Hands-On Home is also enormous. It's almost 400 pages long and feels like Joy of Cooking's younger, prettier sister. But don't let the girth put you off, because The Hands-On Home is divided into easy-to-manage sections by season. It's really like five books in one. First comes the part about basic, year-round instructions. Next comes spring, summer, fall and winter. In each of the seasonal sections there are edible recipes as well as ideas for home and personal care. Northwest Edible Life fans might be asking themselves, "Do I really need to buy this book? Can I find these recipes on Erica's website?"
